

The finished pencil drawing on tissue

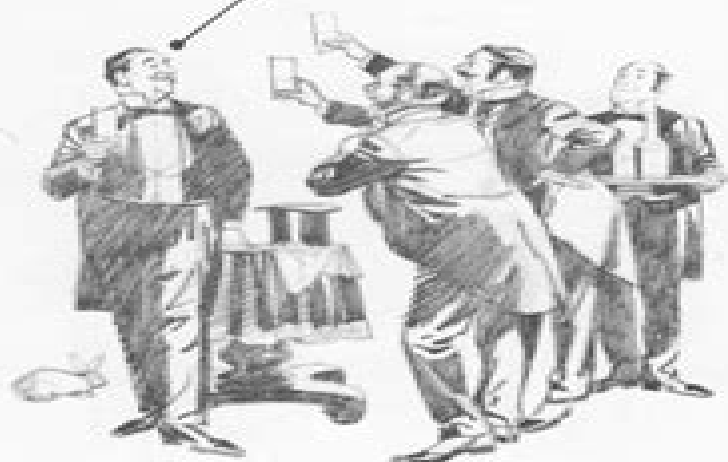

I have now completed the tissue drawing of the entire sequence. Since the original drawing was only twice the size shown here, I used a hard pencil so that the characters and forms could be worked out in detail.

In continuities it is very important to establish your characters unmistakably so that the reader can identify them immediately as he moves from one picture to the next.

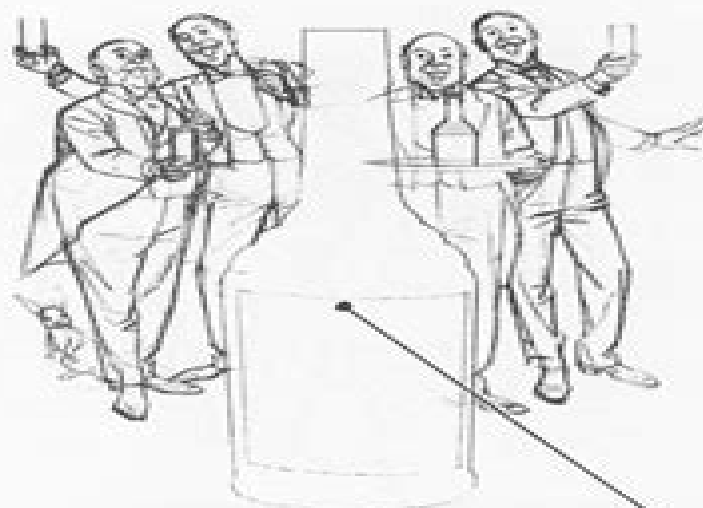

Note that copy indications have been eliminated; I am now concerned only with the pattern of my pictures.

Our friend the rabbit is still present and adds a touch of interest to all the pictures.

After I had transferred the tissue drawing to illustration board I went over the tissue drawing with a soft pencil and established solid areas and tones, as shown here. This was done to all the pictures in the sequence to eliminate guesswork and mistakes in my finished rendering.

Considerable animation was sustained throughout the sequence. This is very important in continuities. However, because of the nature of the product I took great care to keep the characters from appearing too boldness in this last composition.
