
Empowerment in Social Work Practice with Older Women

Colette V. Browne

Literature describing the interface of ageism and sexism on older women, the majority of the nation's elderly population, has resulted in the knowledge that they are a population at risk. Empowerment is a social work process and intervention that has been recommended for work with oppressed populations and with women. An analysis of traditional, feminist, and social work conceptualizations of empowerment, however, identifies issues that are problematic for social workers. This article suggests reasons for broadening the definition and concept of empowerment to allow social welfare professionals to better speak to the multiple needs of women in their later years.

Key words: elderly; empowerment; women

One of social work's most important functions is the empowerment of oppressed people to participate in the decisions that affect their lives (Sheafor, Horejsi, & Horejsi, 1988; Solomon, 1976). Empowerment has been defined as a process (Gutierrez, 1990), an intervention (Parsons & Cox, 1989; Solomon, 1976), and a skill (Mandell & Schram, 1985) benefiting diverse client populations. Recent articles from the social work literature have suggested that empowerment is effective with such varied groups as those with acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) (Haney, 1988), nursing home residents (McDermott, 1989), and seriously ill adolescents (Price, 1988). Empowerment has also been viewed as an especially appealing strategy for women. It has been described as a strategy to assist women re-entering the work force (Towns & Gentzler, 1985), abused women (Hartman, 1983), divorcing women (Ricci, 1985), and women of color (Gutierrez, 1990). The definition of empowerment, however, remains ambiguous and vague (Hegar & Hunzeker, 1988). What has been neglected is a critical analysis of empowerment's basic premises and underlying meanings and how the conceptualization of empowerment shapes interventions.

Also neglected has been an examination of the concept and practice of empowerment with older women, even though elderly women constitute one of the fastest growing segments of the U.S. population (American Association of Retired Persons, 1993). They are significant consumers of social welfare services as a result of the number of problems they face with advanced age—multiple chronic ailments, low incomes, barriers to health and human services, and assignment to unpaid caregiving duties (Hooyman & Kiyak, 1991; Minkler & Stone, 1985; Stone, Cafferata, & Sangl, 1986; Verbrugge, 1989). Interestingly enough, they also live longer than men do (Sempos, Cooper, Kovar, & McMillen, 1988) and appear to have closer relationships with families and friends than men do (Lewittes, 1989; National Institute on Aging & National Institute of Mental Health, 1979; Reinhardt & Fisher, 1989). Older women are both at risk and strong.
