

The short persuasive essay, usually about 30 minutes, has become the standard for many writing tests. Some states require a persuasive essay in the third and fourth grades, and these essays continue on to the SAT and ACT for college admissions and are used in the adult world in job applications. Being a good persuasive writer is a skill you can use for the rest of your life.

Persuasive essay questions or prompts can usually be grouped into one of two kinds. One kind of prompt asks a question and then asks the writer to create an answer and argue why the answer is a good one. An example of this kind of prompt is this eighth grade question from Oklahoma:

If you could live during a different period in history, what period would you choose? Why would you make that choice? Support your ideas with details.

The hardest part in this type of prompt is to remember to brainstorm choices before you begin to write so that you have a choice you can defend with reasons and details. Also, if you have time, you can explain why you rejected one of the choices from your list.

The second kind of prompt, one you would see on the SAT or ACT, requires you to agree or disagree with a position. Here is an example from the ACT:

Many high school libraries use some of their limited funding to subscribe to popular magazines with articles that are interesting to students. Despite limited funding, some educators support this practice because they think having these magazines available encourages students to read. Other educators think school libraries should not use limited funds to subscribe to these magazines because they
