

Writing Learning Stories

With thanks to Margaret Carr and Wendy Lee who created these gems, have the deepest ideas, and offer here the most comprehensive place to look.

A Learning Story engages listeners in an adventure of childhood—enlivened with our own humanity—while offering an opportunity to reflect upon what we can do for young children.

The storyteller shares a tale of emergence, speaking to the child, to the child's family, to guests, and to ourselves as observers and educators. A Learning Story builds upon the tradition of stories told around a campfire. There is no "right way" to tell a story, but a story of learning always begins with the learner's initiative — where the emergence begins. The child or children start on their own, without cues or direction. Stories are always about "good" things we value: nothing negative is said or implied about any child. The tale progresses through the subsequent stages of engagement (becoming involved) and intentionality (causing something) and continues forward in time — one instance one day or connected instances over several days. Generally, this is the sequence to be attentive to when capturing the stages of a story:

Initiative → Engagement → Intentionality → Representation → Benefaction → Reflection

The Deep View of Learning Stories

The New Zealand (Aotearoa) Learning Story narrative assessment connects what we see and how we make meaning of this observed event in the light of the ideals of society and culture as expressed in the goals and strands of Te Whāriki. I believe the congruence between assessment, shared goals and societal ideals is the best of all possible worlds.

Despite the lack of that congruence among ideals for society, goals, and assessment of learning here in the US, I wish to show here how one can write Learning Stories to attend to and convey what it means to grow and become a fully realized human being in a community of others.

When we imagine the biology inside a growing human being, we would recognize the natural flow of learning—passages, I call them—named in that sequence above. I have found that when Learning Stories attend to the passages we go through when we learn, they have a lasting impact on the life of children—an impact beyond anything I have ever seen in education.

You can visit The Learning Frame page to find a discussion of the passages along the journey: transformation—climbing a bit higher—becoming the best we can be.

A Learning Story Convention

A convention is a generalized framework we can refer to for guidance as we proceed, neither restrictive nor rigid.

Six Guides

A story benefits from having at least one photo of the context and child, or group if it is group learning story. Of course, when the photographs can illustrate the sequence of events, the more the story conveys to others when they read it.

1. I like to begin with my own interest in what the child has taken the initiative to do. When I talk about myself in the first person using "I..." I give a "voice" to me, the storyteller. As an observer I bring a personal perspective to the tale.
