It is possible, however, to identify groups of items that share characteristics "within" a classification when patterns of use are identified. For example, even if "unusual" items are qualitatively far from the norm, there might be specific items that are "unusual" only in comparison to the norm. For example, the LITB might identify items that have characteristics that are unusual in only one or two dimensions, but that are not unusual in all dimensions. For example, items that are unusual in only one dimension, but that are not unusual in all dimensions, might be identified as "unusual" items. Items that are unusual in all dimensions, but that are not unusual in all dimensions, might be identified as "unusual" items.
