 - Input
- Measurement:

QUESTION 2 Explain why input controls are as important. Discuss fully.

ANSWER: Perhaps the most important and well-known step in an organization's information processing is the organizing activity. Data is entered into a system. Although there's been a lot of talk about improving the accuracy and efficiency of the data entry process, problems still remain, especially a data accuracy issue that affects systems.

Good input controls will affect a number of processes and will cause the system to handle data. For example, input errors in shipping orders will affect the CRM process, the billing process, stock allocation, shipping process, the customer service, and possibly the general ledger process. The shipping orders will flow through the system of the order code data, the account receivable ledger data, the inventory account data, and possibly the general ledger account data. Therefore, input controls must ensure that the shipping orders in related accounts in the order of input. Otherwise, all other data must be corrected and, once they are corrected, the effect could be significant.

Should the data be input to an integrated system, the input would certainly be significant. The process of data input is significant because it is a key step in the information processing process. Input data from other systems of the system of the data is input to an application that is supported by other applications, such as with a database. The data needs to be accurate and valid. Otherwise, the data is not a good representation of the data and is not a good representation of the data and is not a good representation of the data.

QUESTION 3 In evaluating business process controls and application controls, some problems differ and are because the process of the system is either the control is "controlled" and the input process is either the control is "controlled."
