

Study Section 9

POPULATION AND DEMOGRAPHIC ISSUES IN AFRICA

9.0 INTRODUCTION

In this study session, you will learn about the dynamics of human population. This will enable you to become familiar with concepts like demography, fertility, mortality, migration, census, population policies, family planning and population theory. However, you will be able to obtain a very good score in this session by studying the entire session carefully, attempting all in-text questions (ITQs) and participating in the Self-Assessment Questions (SAQs) in order to get a good grade for yourself.

Learning Outcomes for Study Session 9

At the end of this study session, you should be able to:

- Define the concepts of population and demography
- List the components of population
- Identify measurements of fertility and mortality
- List the sources of demographic data
- Highlight the consequences of rapid population growth
- Define population policy

9.1 WHAT IS POPULATION AND DEMOGRAPHY?

What do you understand by the term “population”? In the context of population studies, the term “population” refers to the inhabitants of a particular territory. A territory can be a country, a state, a local government area or community. Population can also be referred to as a group of people co-existing within a specific geographical area. It can equally be used to describe subpopulations within a group such as the population of males, population of females, population of youth, population of married people, population of the unemployed, population of those in school, population of the Hausa, the Igbo and the Yoruba, and so on and so forth. In all, the term describes the collection of human beings in a particular geographical location either as a whole or as a component part.

Demography, on the other hand, is the branch of social sciences that studies human population. It involves the scientific description of human population. It focuses on the scientific examination of population size (the number of people in the population), analysis of the structure of population (the composition according to age, sex, marital status and other characteristics etc.), examination of the distribution of the population (the spatial dispersal or spread such as how many people are living in rural areas relative to those living in urban areas) and population change. The study of human population is very essential because it gives
