Waring Probability: 50/50mm (Date):

Answer these questions before beginning the lab. (Do) were the significant to which you added your lab report

1. How are radioactive elements different from a stable element?

Radioactive elements are different from a stable element because they have a half-life, which is the time it takes for half of the atoms in a sample to decay. Stable elements do not have a half-life, and their atoms do not decay. Radioactive elements are also different from stable elements in that they have a characteristic decay rate, which is the time it takes for half of the atoms in a sample to decay. This decay rate is constant for a given radioactive element, and it is used to determine the age of a sample.

2. What information does a radioactive element's half-life tell you about that element?

A radioactive element's half-life tells you how long it takes for half of the atoms in a sample to decay. This information is important for determining the age of a sample, and it is also used to determine the rate of decay for a given radioactive element. The half-life of a radioactive element is a constant, and it is used to determine the age of a sample by measuring the amount of the element that remains in a sample after a certain amount of time has passed.

3. Imagine that a radioactive isotope had a half-life of 10 years. In sample number 1, 1000 atoms of the radioactive isotope were present. How many of the following half-lives would it take for the sample to have only 100 atoms left?

Time elapsed (years)	Number of radioactive atoms remaining
0	1000
10	500
20	250
30	125
40	62.5
50	31.25

4. The graph above is a plot of the amount of a radioactive isotope remaining in a sample versus time. Assuming the graph is a plot of the amount of a radioactive isotope remaining in a sample versus time, what is the half-life of the isotope? (20) Explain how you used the graph to determine this information.
