- (d) True.
- (e) True.

Solution of the Q. No. 3

Column A	Column B
(a) Job costing	(ix) Customized goods
(b) Process costing	(iv) Similar products and mass production
(c) Service costing	(vii) Transportation firms
(d) Joint products	(vi) More output from one input
(e) Standard costing	(i) Variance analysis

i. During periods of curtailed activity, it is just as necessary to keep costs down as it is when operating at full capacity. Assuming that the incentive wage plan resulted in greater labor efficiency and lower costs per unit at full capacity, then the labor cost per unit should be lower in a slack period if the incentive wage scale is continued. A shorter workweek or some other system of sharing the work would be indicated.

ii. Ordinarily, it is not a propitious time to initiate an incentive wage plan when a plant is operating far below capacity because the worker is already fearful of something less than full employment. If a reasonable day's work is being received for the going rate of pay, postponement of the incentive plan is indicated. However, there is a natural tendency for workers to reduce output during such periods, thereby increasing costs, with a tendency to bring about further reduction in the volume that can be sold. With full explanation and understanding of the situation, the incentive wage could be introduced with a plant operating at 60% capacity.

The spending and idle capacity variances are usually computed each period by analyzing any over or under-applied overhead. The spending variance is so titled because it is computed by comparing actual overhead with budgeted or allowed overhead. The idle capacity variance, computed by comparing applied overhead with budgeted overhead, is so called because it indicates the effect on overhead of operating at a capacity different from that used in computing the predetermined overhead rate.
