

YT-1300 CONFIGURATIONS

A thought the variety of YT-1300 sub and cockpit configurations featured external dashboard-mounted controls, CSC offered modular options for gun-mounted controls, control-mounted controls, usually located directly above the gap between the mandibles, and controls that could be effective either internally or externally. Some YT-1300s appeared to have no obvious cockpit at all, as CSC also offered options for an "embedded" cockpit, located under a heavily armored but without any windows or displays, a variation that relied heavily on visual sensors for navigation.

While some enthusiasts incorrectly maintain that certain YT-1300 configurations were distinct models of the "Yonca YT-1300," corroborations about the ship's overall length are even more varying. Soon after CSC's major production of the YT-1300, inaccurate measurements for the ship's hull length appeared on official classification documents, as errors in specification that was distributed to representatives of over the galaxy. Some authorities attributed the gaps to a manufacturing inconsistency that was allegedly correct either CSC or the Bureau of Ships and Fisheries (BSF), while others blamed a policy of misinformation within the highly competitive shipbuilding industry. A few industry insiders speculated that CSC may have had the ship's estimated length set by the BSF before CSC incorporated the forecast hulllines into the design. Many pilots became aware of the gaps when traffic controllers directed YT-1300s into docking bays that were too small.

Yet another problem arose when clearing insurance policies that CSC did not authorize the publication of various YT-1300 design schematics that existed in circulation, and which featured costly offshoot internal layouts that could be found in existing ships. Some of these schematics were based on legitimate alternate designs that CSC offered to buyers seeking customization, but other schematics represented configurations that CSC never produced. Evidently, early in the design phase, insurance agencies were issued different sets of prototype deck plans and made models from a CSC shipment office. While details and surface markings, the prototypes were often CSC-made, making it easy to mistake the plans as schematics for actual starships.

As a public service, CSC provided the following diagrams to delineate the various known YT-1300 transport vehicles from unauthorized options.
