

Traditional Openings

We've talked about how—when playing with the Black pieces—we are responding to White in the opening rather than dictating the play. So-called “traditional” openings for Black mean making the most logical responses to White's moves in the opening. Let's say White plays e4 and Black responds with e5: ♟

In the last chapter, you learned that having two pawns in the center is really important. So, Black prevents White from doing that immediately by playing e5—if White now plays d4, Black can capture the pawn. So White will likely do something else.

Instead of playing d4, White moves their knight to f3 (Nf3). Now White is attacking our pawn on e5. ♜

♞ We now make a move that both protects the pawn and develops a piece toward the center by moving our knight to c6 (Nc6). White will continue to develop from here and Black will continue to respond, protecting pieces while developing your own in the most advantageous way.
